Decisions made quickly are not always wrong, but decisions made after careful thought are usually better. A quick decision does not allow enough time to consider all the important factors in a situation. That is why, it is always advisable, if time allows to think calmly and carefully when making a decision. For example, imagine you are the head of a company which is losing money. You must lay off part of the workforce. About 100 workers will lose their jobs. Should you give them one month's notice? That would make things easier for the employees, but the company would have to pay them for the month. Another approach is to tell them tomorrow that they all have been laid off, and have them leave the building the same day. This method may seem cruel, but it would save millions for the company, at a time when every penny matters. On the other hand, the remaining employees may decide that their jobs are at risk too, and leave. Then you would have to replace them. Either approach has both advantages and disadvantages. After all not every decision is so complicated. Most decisions are comparatively simple. When a decision affects your life and the lives of others in some important way, however, a cautious, careful decision is best.
